

Rafael Bernal is the main writer for The Hill newspaper's Latino section, where he covers Hispanic politics by focusing on Latino leaders, issues that affect the Latino community at a national level, including Puerto Rico, and relations between the United States and Latin America. Through The Hill Latino, Rafael has opened to the mainstream coverage of a political phenomenon that is at the center of political discourse in the United States.

Rafael previously worked at United Press International as managing editor. Before jumping into journalism, Rafael practiced law in his native Mexico City, focusing on real estate and tax consulting.

Rafael has a master's degree in journalism from Northwestern University and an undergraduate law degree from Universidad Iberoamericana in Mexico City.